Besides narrations of flexible bodies, the cyborgification of childhood presents us with a particular example of the fragmentation of identity in a system of commodity exchange.

If it is going to make any sense to carry on debates, talks, chats in cyberspace about body and gender – however thematic – could we at least facilitate dialogues across communities and not only spaces that insulate and monopolize it altogether? In order for this to happen some will have to get their act together and speak up, others will have to stop and listen once in a while.

Today's cyborg children are taking things even further; they are pointing the way toward a radical heterogeneity of theory in the presence of computational artifacts that evoke "life."

I have learned that feminism is right – motherhood is possibly the most underrated and undervalued profession, and the state should pay mothers a wage to bring up kids. When someone tells me they're “just a mother and housewife,” I now pay homage, as I might have done pre-motherhood to a high-powered businesswoman or politician.
